We may as well tell you bereasanywhere (unless you have already found out) that Ned was one of those wayward beings, who would not do as he was a mind to, if it happened to agree with any body else's wishes. Not he! If he was a man, of course he had mind enough to know, couldn't he manage would not do as he was a mind to, if it happened to agree with any body else's wishes.

Not he! If he was a man, of course he had mind enough to know, couldn't he manage his own affairs, especially in 'hose nicer matters of the heart where 'all for love' was the only consideration? Occupied with sundry such manly reflections, our hero sped on his way. He was too indignant to think so novel. However, I'll reconnoite."

In the course of events—and who wouldn't have expected it? Ned contrived an exchange of cards. A smile of intelligence crossed the elderly gentleman's face, but Ned saw it not. To him it was only a smile of extification that one bearing so honorable a mane as Edward Warrington, should make their acquaintance, and join himself to their society.
